JOB OUTLOOK

- A bachelor's degree is the minimum requirement for entry-level jobs, but a master's degree may be required for certain positions or for advancement.
- Faster than average job growth is expected. Job prospects for health promotion graduates are expected to be favorable, but those who have acquired experience through internships or volunteer jobs will have better prospects. A graduate degree is preferred by employers in public health and for non-entry-level positions.
- Our graduates pursue public health careers in a variety of settings including non-profit organizations, federal, state and local public health agencies, and healthcare companies.
- The professional field of community health promotion once was practiced mainly in classrooms and health care facilities. Now, community health promotion graduates work in a variety of settings, including all levels of government, voluntary and social service agencies, medical care organizations, workplaces, schools, and advocacy organizations. Opportunities for our graduates internationally are increasingly available.
- Graduates of our program go on to perform the following:
 - Use theories of behavior and social change to inform the planning and evaluation of health interventions
 - Identify individual, community, and policy level interventions that are effective in promoting healthy behaviors and social conditions
 - Design and implement effective individual, community, and policy-level interventions targeting a variety of health behaviors
 - Assess the health status of populations and communities
 - Utilize appropriate data collection strategies and qualitative and quantitative methods to evaluate health interventions
 - Identify the role of cultural, social, and behavioral factors in influencing health behaviors and status
 - Develop and adapt approaches to solving health problems, taking into account cultural differences
 - Communicate health information effectively both in writing and orally
 - Advocate for public health programs and resources
 - Collaborate with public health agencies and other constituency groups
 - Coordinate and manage health programs/services
 - Relate ethical considerations and values to one's professional practice
